The great events of American history cannot be retold too often, for man's memory is short, and even the recent past soon grows blurred and dim. So with the principles upon which the Republic was founded and the ideals which have grown up about it. They should have frequent restatement, not only because they are admirable in themselves, but because they form the foundation of what has come to be known as Americanism — that devotion to justice and liberty and human rights which has ennobled the country's past and by which its future will be shaped.

Far more than any other form of government, a Republic depends for its existence upon the intelligence and devotion of its citizens. They are the government. It consists only of them. They must be proud of their country. They must believe in its destiny and be united in defense of its ideals. It must be first in their hearts. When this is so, it is invincible. Like the towns of ancient Sparta, its citizens are its walls.

No nation exists today of which its people have a better right to be proud than these United States. This book is an effort to show why this is so. It tells again the story of America in terms of poetry, much of it stirring poetry, which sets that story in bold relief and presents it graphically to the imagination. It would be absurd, of course, to pretend that these poems constitute a balanced history, but they do, at least, illumine those gallant and dramatic incidents which appeal most strongly to American patriotism and which Americans have most reason to remember.

Many of them have to do with war, because it is in war that the sort of gallantry and drama which lend themselves to poetry are most conspicuous. But America has no reason to be ashamed of any of her wars, and every reason to be very proud of two of them, which were motivated by a fine ardor
One native maiden waited the command
Of the young Princess of Virginia's strand;
And that dark youth, the Page of Cedar Isle,
Who wept her woes, and shared her sad exile,
With his loved bride, who owned the royal blood,
And near the forest Queen majestically stood.

Some others bent beside the rural shrine
In adoration to the Power divine;
When at the altar knelt, with minds serene,
The gallant Soldier and the dark-browed Queen.

These, for the love they bore her guileless youth,
Paid the high fealty of the warm heart's truth;
And with its homage satisfied, gone o'er
Each vision bright that graced their natal shore.

Those, with forebodings dread and brimful eyes,
Bade holy angels guard the destinies
Of one on whom had fallen the chrism of light
With unction pure; the youthful neophyte
Of that fair clime where millions yet unborn
Shall raise the choral hymn from eve till morn.

In 1616 Pocahontas was taken to England, where she was received at court, renewed her acquaintance with Captain John Smith, had her portrait painted, and led a fashionable life generally. It did not agree with the wild forest creature, she developed consumption, and died at Gravesend, March 27, 1617

THE LAST MEETING OF POCAHONTAS AND THE GREAT CAPTAIN

[June, 1616]

In a stately hall at Brentford, when the English June was green, Sat the Indian Princess, summoned that her graces might be seen,
For the rumor of her beauty filled the ear of court and Queen.
There for audience as she waited, with half-scornful, silent air
All undazzled by the splendor gleaming round her every where,
Dight in broidered hose and doublet, came a courtier down the stair.

As with striding step he hasted, burdened with the Queen's command, Loud he cried, in tones that tingled, "Welcome, welcome, to my land!"
But a tremor seized the Princess, and she drooped upon her hand.

"What! no word, my Sparkling-Water? must I come on bended knee?
I were slain within the forest, I were dead beyond the sea;
On the banks of wild Pamunkey, I had perished but for thee.

"Ah, I keep a heart right loyal, that can nevermore forget!
I can hear the rush, the breathing; I can see the eyelids wet;
I can feel the sudden tightening of thine arms about me yet.

"Nay, look up. Thy father's daughter never feared the face of man,
Shrank not from the forest darkness when her doe-like foot steps ran
To my cabin, bringing tidings of the craft of Powhatan."

With extended arms, entreating, stood the stalwart Captain there,
While the courtiers press around her, and the passing pages stare;
But no sign gave Pocahontas underneath her veil of hair.
All her lithe and willowy figure quivered like an aspen-leaf,
And she crouched as if she shrivelled, frost-touched by some sudden grief,
Turning only on her husband, Rolfe, one glance, sharp, searching, brief.

At the Captain’s haughty gesture, back the curious courtiers drew,
And with soothest word and accent he besought that she would tell
Why she turned away, nor greeted him whom she had served so well.

But for two long hours the Princess dumbly sat and bowed her head, Moveless as the statue near her. When at last she spake,
she said:
"White man’s tongue is false. It told me — told me — that my brave was dead.

"And I lay upon my deerskins all one moon of falling leaves (Who hath care for song or corn-dance, when the voice within her grieves?),
Looking westward where the souls go, up the path the sunset weaves.

Call me ‘child’ now. It is over. On my husband’s arm
I lean;
Never shadow, Nenemoosa, our twain hearts shall come between;
Take my hand, and let us follow the great Captain to his Queen."

MEANWHILE, Jamestown dwindled away, was destroyed by fire during Bacon’s Rebellion, and was never rebuilt. But a new company was formed, of which Lord De La Warr was one of the princi-
